PART 1 - #2. 129 West Montgomery Street has been vacant for at least five years and has suffered accordingly. A fire all but destroyed the rear two-story addition. The metal cornice on the front has been damaged beyond repair. The original first floor front has been remuddled a number of times making it impossible to determine the original configuration.

The existing front contains one of the most unique details of any house in the Little Montgomery Historic District. The wood lintels have a very unique wave-like relief pattern. In addition, a massive wooden bracketed cornice with ventilator panels caps the top of the building. Finally, the original masonry on the front facade is an excellent example of 19 century brick masonry constructed with a running bond pattern and hairline masonry joints known locally as butter joints.

PART 1 - #3. mid-1970s and has no relation to the history of the property. The area was originally patented in 1667 as "Howard's Timber Neck." Because of its close proximity to Baltimore's Inner Harbor, the land of Sharp Leadenhall was marshy and malarial and, therefore, slow to develop. While in the early 19th century the City of Baltimore expanded northward and westward, its push to the south was delayed because of these conditions. The portion of Montgomery Street which lies in the Little Montgomery Historic District was the southern boundary of the incorporated town of Baltimore until 1816 and was originally called Timber Neck Lane.

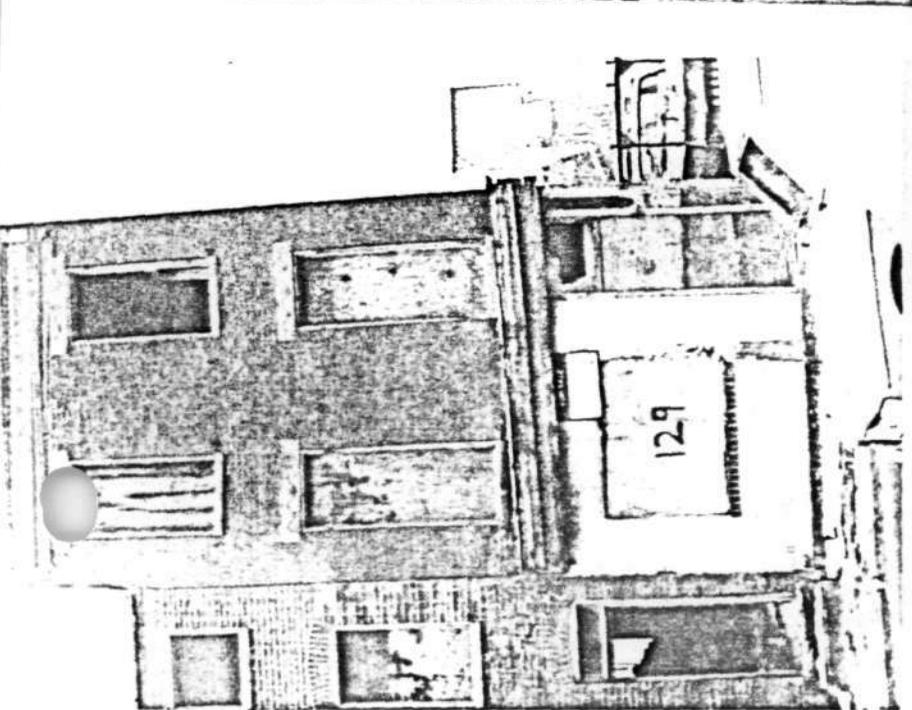

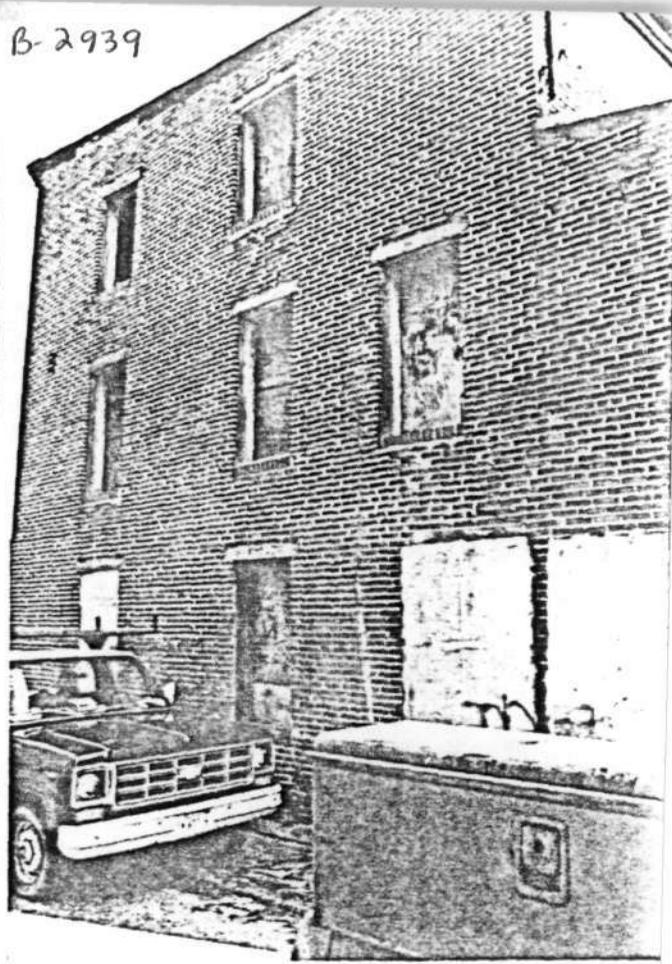

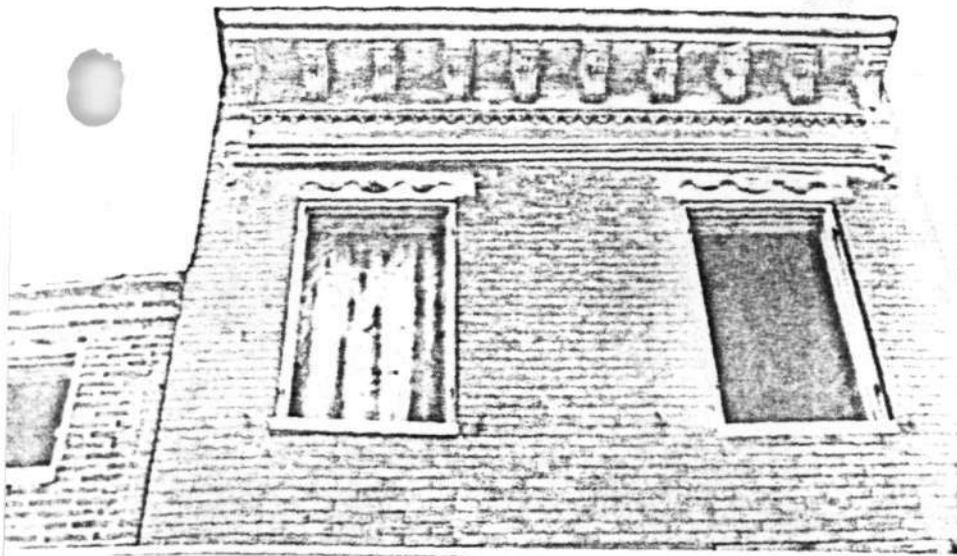

Sometime between August and November, 1811, Sharp Leadenhall, whose only street has been Timber Neck Lane, was completely surveyed for streets. At the same time, the lines of Paca (Howard), Chestnut (Sharp), Peach Alley, which remains to this day, and Leadenhall Street were laid south from Timber Neck Lane to the water. 129 West Montgomery Street is located at the corner of what was originally Timber Neck Lane (Montgomery Street), and Peach Alley. Also in 1811 the land bounded by Montgomery, Leadenhall, Henrietta and Peach Streets which included 129 West Montgomery Street, was purchased at auction by Frederick Sumwalt. Sumwalt, a brick maker, did later become the superintendent of streets, as well as the superintendent of pumps for Baltimore City.

Between 1814 and 1823, some brick buildings were built on Sumwalt's land, none of which survives today with its original front facade.

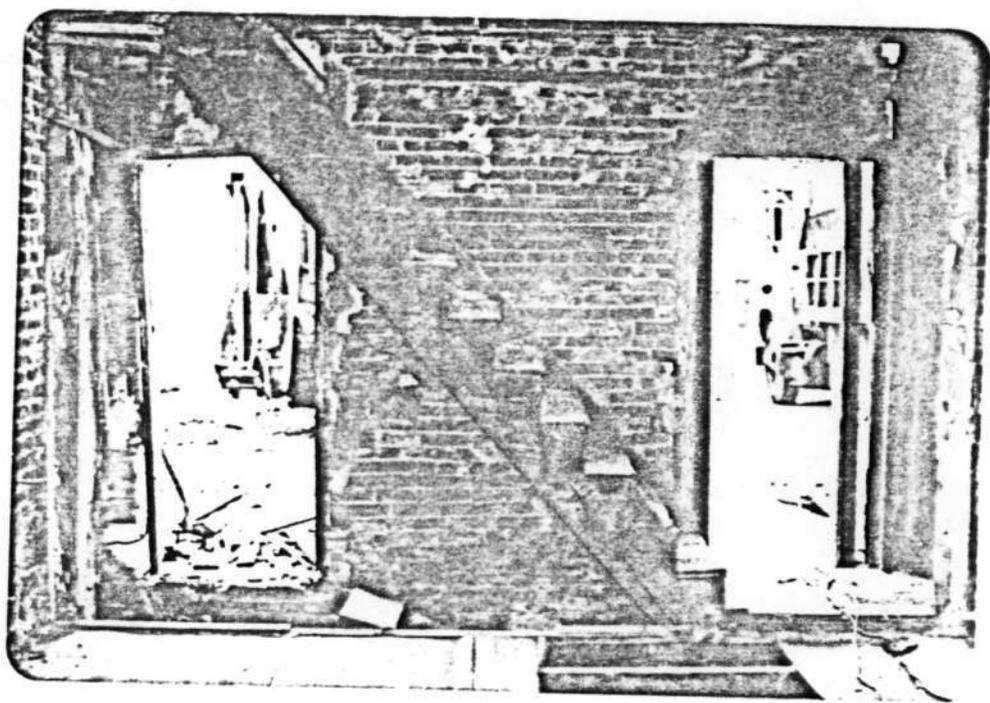

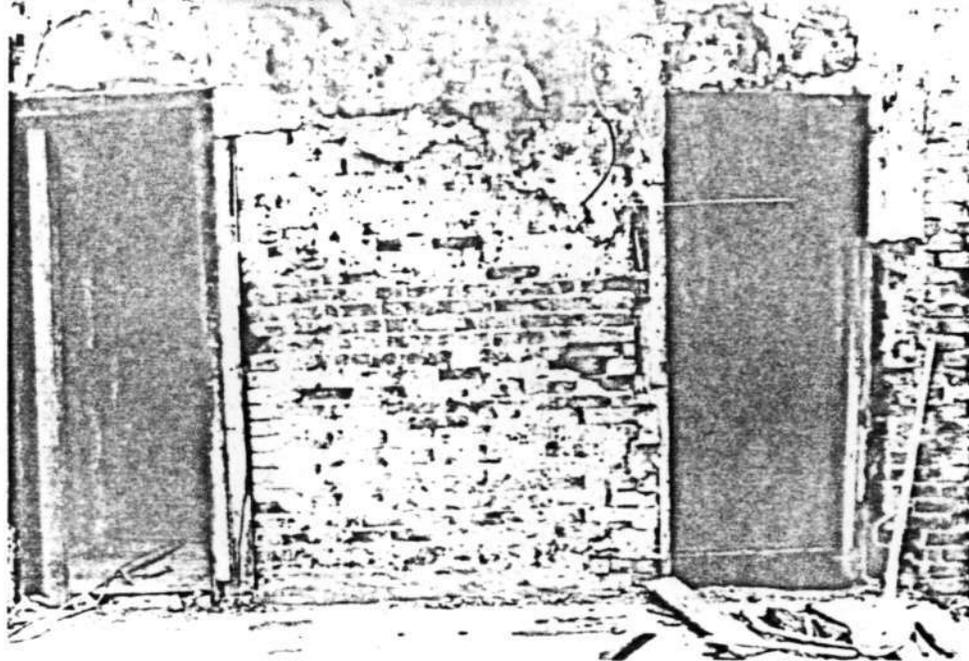

In 1828 construction of the B&O Railroad began, not more than two blocks from 129 West Montgomery Street. Beginning in that year until the completion of the railroad in 1852, the Sharp Leadenhall area finally began to grow. By 1857, when the Camden Station was finally completed, at the time the largest and most elegant in the United States, Little Montgomery Historic District was entirely built. Beginning in the early 1850s nearly all the new purchasers of the property in the District had German surnames. Some did live there, and some did sell them to the wave of German immigrants who had begun to enter Baltimore in great numbers in the 1840s. The wave of immigration in the District caused severe competition among the laboring classes of Baltimore before the decade of the Civil War. As early as 1846, the intersection of Hill, Sharp, Montgomery and Hughes Streets, was named Hermitage Square, reflecting the strong fervor of Jacksonian democrats. Hermitage Square was located directly across the street from 129 West Montgomery Street. In addition, the first southern police station constructed in 1856 was located on the southeast corner of Hermitage Square at the intersections of Hughes and Montgomery Streets. As time wore on Timber Neck Lane came to be known as Little Montgomery Street. The feel for Little Montgomery Street remains today. The intimate scale that such a street possesses along with the juxtaposition of the two street grids makes the District a unique space within the urban environment. This part of Montgomery Street acts as a link to the social economic and architectural history of Baltimore.

ALL OF THE INFORMATION CONTAINED IN THIS APPLICATION WAS OBTAINED FROM THE CERTIFICATION APPLICATION OF THE LITTLE MONTGOMERY HISTORIC DISTRICT. THE SITE SURVEYS WERE MADE BY THE BALTIMORE CITY COMMISSION FOR HISTORICAL AND ARCHITECTURAL PRESERVATION.

 DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (IF KNOWN) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

This three story high, two bay wide building is at the end of a row, occupying a corner site. At one time the building housed a commercial establishment on the first floor. The building is of brick laid in running bond.

The first floor has been severely altered and is now virtually a wall of concrete set beneath a galvanized metal cornice. Second floor windows are taller than those on the third, but all are framed in the same wooden pattern. Sills and lintels are of wood, and shutter hinges remain at each frame. The uniquely ornamented lintels each feature a carved area of waves spanning the lintels. Wooden rosettes originally rested at the center of each lintel.

The broad wooden cornice features a wide freize terminated on either end by a pair of brackets set in from the sides of the facade. A row of modillions supports the projecting cornice.
